THE disguise that began by dis-nifying "Nat" into N. C. Good-win was completed last night when the comedian put on a hoary wig and whiskers and, with a wellrehearsed pair of sea legs, came rolling on the Lyceum stage as the amorous skipper of the Heart and Hand in Beauty and the Barge." His name on the programme was the only clue to his identity. Otherwise, his closest friend would not have recognized him. And here arises a serious questions Are the countless admirers of Mr. Goodwin satisfied to have him disguised? Only the box-office can an-

For a great many years Mr. Goodwin's plain, unadorned face has been one of his most valuabe assets. The first glimpse of it has always been the signal for a glad welcome. Audiences, too, have revelled in his unalloyed Americanism. Both are thrown over board in "Beauty and the Barge."

The appointed captain, and an emotional lines take a droil turn every now and deckhand, trying hard to be pathetic, then, and many of the characters are what we commonly call "quaint." The late James A. Herne put their American equivalents into "Shore Acres" and "Sag Harbos," and we accepted them. But it is doubtful whether London would have understood them. That same doubt applies to the present case. The story in itself can hardly be expected to hold the interest of an American audience. The types are its only salvation.

The body of a well-dressed, apparently efined old lady, who died in the Harem Hospital to-day after being thrown from a Second avenue car at One Hundred and Twenty-first street last night, is at the Harlem Morgue awaiting a claimant. Nothing was found on the woman by which her identity could be established save an envelope containing he name of James M. Murray and the address, No. 810 Main s reet, Conn. No

The old lady was riding uptown and started to get out at One Hundred and Twenty-first street. The car started suddenly and she was thrown from the tep, landing on her head and fractur-consciousness.

She was about sixty years of age, tall and thin, with gray hair, and wore a black skirt and a white waist. The bolice are trying to locate her friends or relatives. They are also seeking the motorman and conductor of the car.
